A mixture of truth and fiction-an astonishing account of how striking it rich in Africa unfolded through the ingenuity of an indigenous African whose discovery of the world's most beautiful and most expensive diamond, named "The Star of Venus," and his eventual rise to power and worldwide influence, created a new way of life in Africa-the new Africa Way-a place where corrupt and unconscionable leadership, famine, poverty, political upheaval, social unrest, and eventual civil wars no longer exist. Striking it rich in Africa under the umbrella of indigenous stock markets became commonplace after a payable deposit of diamonds was discovered. Ramssey, through his wealth, gained the power and influence he needed to change the way Africans do business to a more amiable society where bribery, largely due to low wages, was no longer-a well-organized and modern market economy, where trading in bonds, mutual funds, and the like became commonplace and its government no longer had to borrow from external sources. Instead, Africa went on to establish a credibility where selling its bonds and other financial certificates to both national and international investors was met with open arms. Indeed, paying back its debts to investors in full and on time made doing business in Africa investor's paradise. Through the wisdom of Ramssey, Africa could now boast the most viable venture-capital market the world has ever known, existing in the western part of Africa-Liberia-whose economic prosperity spread to the rest of Africa and brought about changes that engendered the envy of the entire world, including the United Kingdom.
