There's a lot of interest in tiny houses these days. Some people want to downsize. Others are looking for ways to reconnect with simpler times and a less complicated way of living.

I think interest has also been growing because the cost of buying or renting a home nowadays is getting more expensive, and some people are re-evaluating what they really need in the way of a living space.

A great advantage of living in a tiny house is that you get a "real" quality interior and yet it is movable. If your plans change you can relocate your tiny house to a new setting. You might enjoy working and living up in the mountains and then later decide to move to live by the ocean. This is possible with a Tiny House. In 2009 I designed the "micro-Palace" and organized its construction.

Building a Tiny House illustrates the process of building the micro-Palace through a series of 193 photos with descriptions, drawings and information tables.

This book is not a substitute for a set of plans, but the photos take you from the very beginning of the project, starting with the raw trailer, to the finished home sitting on its foundation pads.

It will give you a vast amount of detailed information about how to build your own tiny house like the micro-Palace.
